Drain the Roads.

Those who have studied the road question suggest that where rock or gravel roads cannot be made that a drain be laid under the center of the roadway, having vents at all the depressions. These can be made with tile, stone or even three or four poles laid in a bunch in the center. Let these be about a foot under the center of the road. The water will be drawn off very rapidly in this way, and the roads never become very muddy. It is the standing of the water in the roads that causes them to become worked up by travel, into a deep mire. Roads may be rounded up ever so much. The tracks made by horses and vehicles will hold the water and keep it in the roads to soften it, unless there is under-drainage. Where these under-drains have been tried, their beneficial effect is said to be wonderful, and it stands to reason that such should be the case. Lands that were worthless on account of being wet and clammy, have been made by under-drainage the most productive in the country. If a channel for the passage of the water from the roads can be made not over a foot below the surface, all the water would speedily reach it, and the surface be left comparatively hard. The cost of such drainage could not be more than from $75 to $300 per mile. We hope it will be tried in this county this year by numerous overseers, that we may see just how beneficial such drainage is. Shelby Democrat.
